Atrial fibrillation (AF) is prevalent in patients with heart failure and associated with a high morbidity and mortality. Whether the risks of antiarrhythmic drug therapy extend to the general population of patients with AF and heart failure is unclear. We used Cox proportional hazards regression models to assess the association of medication use and long-term all-cause mortality in this population. The sample included 9,194 participants in the Multi-Ethnic Study of Atherosclerosis, a cohort of African-American, Hispanic, white, and Chinese participants from the Los Angeles, San Francisco, and New York areas. For each participant, the cohort was followed for a median of 7.2 years, and 1,550 incident deaths occurred. In multivariable models, compared with no antiarrhythmic drug use, use of non-antiarrhythmic class I ($\beta = 0.31$, 95% confidence interval [CI] = 0.07, 0.55) or class III drugs ($\beta = 0.58$, 95% CI = 0.27, 0.90) was associated with an increased risk of mortality, whereas use of antiarrhythmic drugs was associated with a decreased risk ($\beta = -0.39$, 95% CI = -0.58, -0.19) and use of amiodarone was associated with an increased risk ($\beta = 1.07$, 95% CI = 0.67, 1.49). When a dosage analysis was performed, neither the dose of amiodarone nor the dose of sotalol was associated with risk. Antiarrhythmic drug use in patients with heart failure and AF
