Q: Using the connection string with both sql and postgresql I can query using the connection string for both SqlServer and PostgreSQL. But from what I've seen, there shouldn't be two connection strings for one database: (connectionString = @"Data Source=(local);Initial Catalog=IQL;Integrated Security=True") Can I use the same connection string with both databases, instead of having different connection strings for each? Is it possible?

A: Yes, this is exactly what a connection string is designed to do. The connection string of the SQL Server type is the connection string for SQL Server. The connection string of the PostgreSQL type is the connection string for PostgreSQL. These two types of connection strings are thus the same thing in a sense that they both connect to the same data source. Technically, the two types are not the same, but that's just the imprecision of the naming. They are distinct connection strings only because they are separate instances of the same underlying type of connection string.

require 'chef_helper'
describe 'port state' do
  it 'should not fail when the port is null' do
    resource_name = 'router'
    port = nil
    json = apply_resource_change(resource_name, :port => port, :json => true) expect(json['metadata']['port']).to eq('0') end
  it 'should not fail when the port is an empty string' do
    resource_name = 'router'
    port = ''
